Dividing a Journey.
An Englishman was sent out on a journey to take a parcel to a place about twelve miles from Maldon, Essex, a little town near the coast. As he started rather late in the day his master was surprised to see him back soon after dark. "You surely haven't been there and back," his employer said to him. "No, no, master," the man replied; "I got halfway there, and it began to get dark, so I com'd back ag'in. I'll goo t'other half tomorrow."

A NATIONAL TRAGEDY.

Dramatic Scene at the Degradation of Captain Dreyfus.

Nine o'clock; General Darras draws his sword; orders ring out; the infantrymen shoulder arms; the sabers of the cavalry gleam; at the far edge of the field a little group appears. It is made up of four artillerymen in somber dolmans. In the center is Dreyfus, the light flashing on his sword, on the three gold gallons that mark his rank. Beside him strides the adjutant of the guard, the executioner of the military decree, a giant of a man, cloaked, plumed, glorious. The little group comes obliquely across the naked field. The "traitor's" step is firm, his head is high, his left hand grasps the hilt of his sword. Without the mob lifts its dull clamor, the sulky growl of 6,000 alcoholic throats. Where the general sits on his horse the little group halts. The cannoners fall back, and Dreyfus stands alone. Very small he seems; motionless, cut in steel. And the general speaks:

"Dreyfus, you are unworthy to bear arms. In the name of the French republic I degrade you!"

Then the desolate man raises suddenly his arms to heaven and cries with a loud voice, "I am innocent!"

As sudden is the roar that comes from the Latin mob, surging against the iron fence, "Death!" and "Judas!" and "Traitor!" A silence more terrible than the roar of the mob falls as the executioner steps forward, strips off the epaulettes, the gold braid, the gold buttons—ensigns of a man's honor—and breaks across his knee the soldier's sword. And Dreyfus stands immobile, beaten upon by all the winds of fate. Only when the sword snaps in twain a great cry comes from him—a male cry, sonorous and stern:

"On the heads of my wife and children I swear I am innocent! I swear it! Vive la France!"

And the mob, in the streets, at the gates, on the roof tops, howls: "Death! Death!" It is the answer of France. The parade begins. The little group is led now by two officers of the Republican guard. Slowly it passes the long files of the soldiery, just beyond sword reach—lest an impulsive saber should reach the "traitor's" heart. The little man is dressed in black rags now. But he marches steadily, his head erect. There is not a quiver in him, so firm is his drilled courage of a soldier. When he passes the fence, behind which the mob seethes, he cries once more his innocence and "Vive la France!" What he says they cannot hear, but they answer him with crucifying clamor. To the journalists he says, "Tell France I am innocent!" And they call him "Judas" and "traitor." Not once does he lower his head in this grim parade of agony. Not once does he give way to fear or anger. As though he had made himself iron, he passes, proclaiming his guiltless honor and his love for France.—Vance Thompson in Success Magazine.

His Weapon.
In some parts of Ireland it is a custom among bank clerks to speak of one another as "officers" to the bank, but little Jim Bender, the recently imported Cockney waiter in a County Mayo hotel, was not aware of this custom.

"Have you seen any of our officers here this morning?" asked a lordly knight of the quill of Jim a few days ago.

Jim glanced keenly at his interrogator.

"Yussir," he answered promptly; "it isn't three minutes ago since one of 'em went out with his sword behind 'is ear."—London Answers.

Made It Even.
Curran, when master of the rolls in Ireland, was going one day to a levee at the castle. There was a great press of carriages, when all at once he was startled by the pole of the carriage which followed him crashing through the back of his.

He hastily put his head out of the window, crying to his coachman: "Stop, stop! The pole of the carriage behind is driven into us."

"Arrah, then, it's all right again, your honor," said Pat, "for I've just druv my pole into the carriage before."

Had You
Planned to do
Any Papering?

Well, by far the most particular part of all your plans is to make sure that the right paper goes on the walls.

The cost of the paper is worth considering—but style, newness, suitability is your main lookout.

For it is quite possible for you to pay us 5c a roll and get new designs, while at other places you may pay as high as 40c a roll, and still have patterns away behind the times.

The hint should be plain enough. We've a whole NEW stock to show you—a bright, dependable lot of paper. Wall paper that you can buy from us safely without knowing anything at all about Wall Paper quality.

We are really anxious to have you see it, for we feel that we can make it profitable for you to do your buying here.
